

Making Decisions:

- How does your business make decisions?
- Are decisions made by one person, such as the president or vice president, or by a consensus of key staff from various departments?
- Are there certain interest groups within your business that should be accommodated?
- Is there a board of directors that is active in all major decisions?
- If you are head of the organization, do you have the time and a strong desire to be involved in the design and construction process?
- Is this a corporate responsibility you would delegate?
- To whom would you delegate? Who has the experience and skills to manage your project?
- If the president decides to delegate, is he or she prepared to live by the decisions of others?

Project Management:

The coordination of all project participants is key to efficient and cost effective project management. We understand the responsibilities of each project, and by staying ahead of the process, project difficulties are minimized and project efficiency maximized. Our extensive experience in collaborating and problem solving with client, consultants, governmental agencies and professional colleagues involving design and construction issues help insure a smooth transition from concept to reality.
